The Atlantic Monthly writer fells how one of his best advertisers came to him with a request that the story of how one of the advertiser's friends had swindled an innocent farmer be kept out of the paper. The friend was a criminal and the advertiser and the editor knew it. The threat was made that if the story was printed the advertiser would withdraw his patronage. The writer confesses that the item of news that might have protected other innocent people from a common swindler was left out of the paper.

forestry or those whose training is incomplete the bureau has only one kind of work. It is that of student assistant.

This is practically the place of helper in field work, and it lasts from three to six months. The wages paid are $26 a month and expenses. The men pay their own way to and from the field. If they are ordered to Washington at the close of the outdoor season to finish up the routine work, the bureau pays the expense. of doing so for a permanent calling. So many applications have come to the bureau from college students already studying forestry that men entirely without preliminary training must be fitted exceptionally for work in the woods to get appointments.

The work of these student assistants is severe. They live in camps and keep the hours of lumbermen. Their chief labor is in valuation surveys, that is, in measuring standing timber or the contents and rate of growth of felled trees.

It requires strong young men for this labor and all the instruction that such a student receives is what he absorbs in his work. The circular says of these student assistants:

"They are not attending a summer school, but are taking a salaried position, the duties of which they will be rigidly required to perform. The head of the party is at all times willing, in so far as it does not interfere with his own duties, to explain matters to the men under his charge.

"He has, however, no time to deliver charge.

"He has, however, no time to deliver lectures nor to give formal instruction of any kind. The student assistant has in his dally work abundant opportunity to learn; whether he makes the most of it rests with him."

The bureau's circular says a trained forester should be skilled in geology, physical geography, mineralogy, chemistry, botany, mathematics, and the practical principles of surveying. It also says that the expert forester should know something of physics, meterology and political economy.

There are three schools of forestry in the country, one at Cornell, one at Yale and one at Biltmore, N. C. The Cornell school requires four years' study, the Yale school requires two. The Biltmore school gives instruction of one year without a degree. Further details may be secured that a school with the schools.

As to the future employment of foresters the bureau says it "is at present unble to find a sufficient number of suitably prepared foresters to supply its needs."

The property took her to Manitou, Denver, Colorado Springs, Salt Lake City, Boston, via New York, Niagara Falis, and thence back to Chicago. The stay in Chicago did not give the young traveler time to learn the distance between Hyde park and the canal before she was whisked off to Minneapolis and St. Paul, going back to Chicago for the holidays.
